

Albert Llovera decides to stop... for now.

Only hours before embarking on his trip to Trier for the German Rally reconnaissance sessions, Albert Llovera has decided to take a break to recover physically. The tendinitis in his left arm has been one of the obstacles he's had to overcome in previous rallies. The problem has now become so serious that his right arm is also affected by the tendinitis. There is only one solution and that is to stop.

Very much in spite of himself and after thoroughly thinking about it, the Abarth driver has possibly made the toughest decision in his extensive sports career, these were his words: It's true that the season has been really complicated in all its aspects, the results aren't what we expected: we haven't finished two of the four races, the budget is barely above the minimum required... anyway, all these aspects can improve with effort and with a 360° turn in our luck. This will allow us to return to the great moments we've had in this competition. However, when my body can't follow, more effort can have serious consequences in the future and that's why it's not worth taking any more risks. Therefore before racing again, I want to recover so I feel 100% and can compete with high chances of success.

With this declaration of his intentions, Albert Llovera clearly establishes that, for now, he has sorted out his priorities and the first one in his personal ranking is his health. There will be a time to go back to the competition in full fitness.
